IN November, 1975, an action was filed in the United States District Court for the District of Oregon on behalf of all applicants for Social Security Survivorship benefits who lived in Oregon and whose income without Survivorship benefits was below the poverty level.

The relief sought in this action was a procedure by which the Social Security Administration would promptly certify applicants for benefits and begin making payments to them within a reasonable time. Although the Social Security Act provided for preliminary payments to survivors in need, no detailed procedure had been adopted to do this.

As a result of negotiations during this case, the Social Security Administration has established a preliminary payment procedure under which an applicant for benefits who meets minimum proof requirements of survivorship and who is in immediate financial need can receive up to three benefit checks pending final certification.

The named plaintiffs are satisfied with this procedure. Because they represent all class members, they give this notice of their intention to dismiss this action on July 28, 1977. If you are a class member and do not want the action dismissed, you must file your objections at the United States Courthouse, Portland, Oregon 97207, before July 28, 1977, in Civil Case No. 75-1045, Helen Canary, et al, v. David Mathews.

Game board still fights tribal status for Siletz

By BILL KELLER
of The Oregonian staff

WASHINGTON — Oregon Fish and Wildlife Director John Donaldson said Wednesday the state Game Commission remains adamantly opposed to legislation restoring federal recognition to the coastal Siletz Indians.

But Sen. Mark Hatfield, R-Ore., a sponsor of the legislation, warned that without this bill the game officials may get something much less to their liking — a national Indian restoration bill with no special safeguards for Oregon.

Donaldson told a Senate subcommittee state game officials believe that, despite compromises in the provisions of the bill, it might still confer some legal advantages on the Siletz Indians if they ever try to claim unregulated hunting and fishing rights.

"We're afraid if we lose on this, there goes the whole coast," Donaldson said after the hearing. "We feel we have to dig in our heels."

The alarm of Oregon game officials persists despite assurances by the bill's sponsors — Hatfield and Rep. Les AuCoin, D-Ore. — and federal lawyers that the legislation would only entitle the tribe to desperately needed federal social programs.

The bill has been rewritten to require a two-year delay in congressional approval before the tribe could establish a reservation. And the tribe says it is interested only in about 37 acres, which may be donated by the town of Siletz, and whatever land tribal members may manage to acquire by purchase.

Moreover, administration lawyers asserted last year — and were expected to repeat in a House hearing Thursday — that restoration of the tribe's federal status would not give the Indians any advantages in possible later claims against the government.

The Fish and Wildlife Commission, however, is promoting an alternate bill that would entitle the Indians to Health, Education and Welfare programs without restoring federal recognition.

The alternate proposal would also create a "national Siletz historical site and appropriate cultural museum" in Lincoln County, to be administered by the U.S. Park Service, rather than allowing establishment of a reservation.

Charles Wilkinson, a lawyer for the Siletz tribe, said that this provision would pre-empt the Indians' right to a future reservation.

The Carter administration said in a letter from Interior Secretary Cecil Andrus that it supports restoration of the Siletz tribe, though it proposes some technical changes in the bill.

On Wednesday, acting Indian Commissioner Ray Butler said that he has already sent the White House a preliminary draft of legislation which would restore federal recognition to large numbers of Indians across the nation who have been involuntarily stripped of their tribal status, like the Siletz.

Such a bill, Hatfield warned Donaldson, may not contain any restrictions on a reservation or hunting and fishing rights specifically related to the Siletz tribe.

The Siletz once ruled a reservation covering 1.4 million acres of Southwest Oregon, including six major fishing rivers, but the tribe has eschewed any legal claim to this land.

What concerns game officials is that whatever land the tribe may acquire as a reservation would probably be exempt from state conservation and other laws.

"These issues are not local even though attention is now focused on the Siletz Indians," Donaldson said in a prepared statement Wednesday. "The Oregon Fish and Wildlife Commission strongly believes that the state must retain authority to manage and conserve its fish and wildlife resources in the interest of all citizens."

Kidnap case pleading set

HILLSBORO — Ronald Weber of Forest Grove was ordered Wednesday by Washington County Circuit Judge Hollie Pihl to appear Aug. 15 to enter a plea to a kidnaping charge.

A county secret grand jury indictment June 15 alleged that Weber took a Sunset Valley Elementary School student to Forest Park in Portland on April 4, then returned the sixth grader to an area near the school 90 minutes later. Authorities said the girl was not harmed or sexually attacked.

A composite drawing made with the aid of the victim assisted in the investigation, according to Scott Upham, county deputy district attorney.

Weber, who operates a hardware store in Forest Grove, is free on his own recognizance.
